A brief interlude between Chapters 2 and 3 introduces the notion of "progressive" chamber music, a term that seemed antithetical to mid-nineteenth-century music-political writers who, like modern-day commentators, often deemed chamber music inherently conservative.

Musical performances for small groups of people became popular events, and some composers/performers were able to support themselves financially by performing in these small venues and attracting wealthy patrons. Most famous among these was Frédéric Chopin (1810–1849). Music in the parlor was of a very different sort than in the concert hall.

This book examines the music available to musical consumers in the nineteenth century, and what that music tells us about their tastes, priorities, and activities. The book's social history of chamber music performance places the works of canonic composers such as Schubert, Brahms, and Dvořák in relation to lesser-known but influential peers.

Classical chamber music, or music written during the period of 1750-1820, was very airy and light in sound as compared to orchestral music and it was performed in more intimate settings or chambers. The form of early chamber music appeared to have begun from the writings of Joseph Haydn and consisted of four movements: fast, slow, a scherzo or minuet, and fast.
