The Bleeding of the Stone Ibrahim Al-Koni. A

deceptively easy read, stylistically, but grappling with some big issues. If you're into people's inner worlds, the beliefs that shape them and the links between people and the environment, and you look to your fiction to be more mythical than thriller, this could be for you.

26/6/2010 · The Bleeding of the Stone by Ibrahim Al-Koni. The Bleeding of the Stone is a Libyan novel about Asouf, a Bedouin man living a hermit-like existence out in the desert, herding goats and occasionally guiding foreigners to see the rock paintings on the walls of the wadis.

10/10/2017 · The author,

Ibrahim Al-Koni, is Tuareg and it's crystal clear that he's intimately in tune with his people's deep desert roots. His love of that land absolutely bursts out of almost every line of this book; once I started it, I could not put it down.

Bleeding of the Stone is also a novel of contextual environmentalism. As Al Koni builds up the stories, we receive a picture of a land wasted, a land destroyed, because the people have chosen ways removed from their soul, from the desert, and have become possessed.
